

Showerhead Mineral Deposit Maintenance Tip:

Hard water can leave your showerhead clogged and unsightly looking. Removing the mineral deposits caused by hard water may not be a pleasant chore, but it is possible.

For fast cleaning action, fill a gallon size plastic bag half way up with vinegar and secure it to your showerhead using a rubber band or string. Leave the plastic bag in place for around two hours for maximum sparkle. The acid in the vinegar will work as a solvent to remove and work away at the mineral deposits until they are gone.

You can also remove the showerhead and allow it to soak in vinegar in a bucket or sink until the mineral deposits are removed. With either method, you can use an old toothbrush to scrub away any residue and then simply wipe off with a damp cloth. To clean the spray holes of your showerhead, a toothpick works wonders once the vinegar has begun to dissolve the mineral deposits away.

For really tough mineral deposits, you can also place your showerhead in a pot of water that is reconstituted with one half part vinegar. Bring the vinegar and water solution to a boil with the showerhead inside and boil for fifteen minutes. Remove the showerhead to see if the mineral deposits have become detached; if not, boil for an additional five minutes at a time until the results you are looking for are achieved. Again, you can use an old toothbrush and a toothpick to finish up the cleaning job and then wipe the shower head down with a damp cloth
